Clarence Kelley Gets Top Medal

Clarence M. Kelley, former director of the FBI, was awarded the intelligence community's highest medal yesterday in ceremonies at CIA headquarters in Langley.

Kelley, who headed the FBI from 1973 to 1978, was cited for his efforts in renewing cooperation between intelligence agencies. CIA Director Stansfield Turner presented the National Intelligence Distinguished Service medal, which also has been won by former CIA heads James R. Schlesinger, Jr. William E. Colby and George Bush.

Kelley now lives in Kansas City, and is president of a police management consulting firm based in Reston, Va.
